

Among young domestic authors, A. Monasuyev notes that the provisions of the international treaties relating to human rights objectively endow an certain rights based on international

Summarizing what has been said, we would like to note that a natural person (an individual) manifests oneself as a subject of the international law not only by defending his interests in international courts or being criminally liable for the commission of international crimes. Unquestionably, having the quality in question, the individual realizes it, for example, by entering into a legal relationship with another state regarding the acquisition of a second citizenship. state does not even suspect this - the process proceeds without its participation and knowledge. All this, in combination, allows us to ascertain the fact that international legal personality of natural persons (individuals) is being confirmed by international practice.